We sought to determine the proportion of patients with ragweed allergy who would test positive on immediate and late-phase skin tests with ragweed extract and if immediate or late phase tests would identify patients with ragweed-specific IgE antibodies. We analyzed the results of skin tests from a randomized, double-blind, placebo-controlled study that assessed the efficacy of the immunotherapy adjuvant DSCG among 33 subjects with ragweed allergy who were skin prick test-positive to both ragweed and mugwort. Twenty-four patients were sensitized to ragweed by immunoglobulin E test ( $>$  or  $=0.7$  IU/mL), and 16 had evidence of sensitization by skin testing. Patients were randomized to receive a single intralesional injection of ragweed extract (LE) or placebo. One year later, patients returned for repeat skin testing and a repeat LE injection. Results of ragweed skin tests were positive in 13 (54%) of 24 patients and negative in 11 (46%) of 24 patients. Repeat injection of LE to these patients resulted in positive skin tests in 13

(54%) of 24 patients, suggesting that there may be allergen-specific IgE antibodies below the threshold of detection in some patients. In contrast, neither the skin test nor injection of ragweed extract resulted in a positive skin test in the patients with a negative pre-treatment LE skin test. Skin tests in patients with clinical symptoms had a higher positive and negative predictive value than skin tests from the asymptomatic patients. We found that ragweed-specific IgE antibodies were present in 52% of skin test-positive patients.
